Technocracy by: Jeff Davidson

The second decade of the new millennium will be one in which broad, sweeping dominance of technology will expand, enlighten, and threaten various aspects of our existence. Because of the ever-growing capabilities of the almighty, shrinking microchip, and widespread, inexpensive DNA scanning, nearly everything we now know and understand about connectivity, social media, robotics, energy alternatives, and health and wellness will be turned on its head.

It's Raining Information

The individual's relationship with information, however, could trump everything else in terms of magnitude. Information will come to us in even faster streams than ever before, and in ways that enable us to better harness its potential and enhance our intelligence. Armed with shopping comparison data from our mobile devices, for example we will be better equipped to make effective purchases. This in turn will impact how products and services are conceived, designed, packaged, placed, and delivered.

The ability to quickly gather, manipulate, interpret, and apply information in the workplace will impact how companies organize themselves, how teams communicate, how short and long-term projects unfold, who gets promoted, and who gets left behind.
